SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Baseball announcer Dick Enberg, who became a voice of the National Football League and the National Basketball Association as well as Major League Baseball, has died. He was 81. Enberg's agent, Larry Fisher, said Thursday that Enberg died Thursday at a hospital in Sacramento. The cause of death was not immediately known. Fisher said the family had planned a news conference Friday morning. Enberg announced home runs, plays, and fired the starting pitcher in the professional games he broadcast. He is credited with helping to bring the popularity of baseball to American football fans and basketball fans, calling more than 200 playoff games and 45 World Series. In an interview in 2011, Enberg said he received a call in 1962 to do home runs for Dodgers announcer Vin Scully. "They had just been sold to a different group, so they had to find somebody else," Enberg said. "It was the first time I had ever been asked to do something like that." He went on to call 20 World Series from 1967 to 2011, for television and radio networks in the U.S. and Mexico. "Dick Enberg has been a sportsman's sportsman," said Howard Cosell, a legendary NFL broadcaster, in a statement released by Enberg's representatives. "Not only was he one of the best broadcasters of our time, he was a true gentleman. Dick Enberg was a fan's fan and he represented the game at the highest level. Dick's impact on Major League Baseball and the National Football League was beyond measure." Enberg won a gold glove as a baseball catcher in college and a championship
