Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) is a common childhood disorder, characterised by impulsive and hyperactive behaviour. It can affect about 5 to 10 per cent of children and can persist into adulthood. The condition affects both males and females. About 50 per cent of children with ADHD also have conditions such as learning difficulties, dyslexia and a language disorder. In most cases the symptoms of ADHD go away by adolescence. With the help of a doctor and good medication, adults with ADHD can cope with everyday life. However, some adults with ADHD still have problems in social situations and at work. Genetic factors One of the leading causes of ADHD is genetic factors. ADHD is more common among people who have a close relative with the condition.

Prognosis Most children with ADHD have a good prognosis and resolve their symptoms with the help of medication. However, a very small number of people continue to have symptoms throughout their lives. This can be because of problems with the brain.

Risk factors ADHD is more common in boys than girls. People who have ADHD are more likely to be over three feet tall and are more likely to have a parent or grandparent who has the condition. It is more common in people who have an extra chromosome called 15 (15q because of its position on the chromosome). Health problems ADHD is more common in people who have other health problems, such as learning difficulties and epilepsy. It is also more common in people who have a family history of problems such as depression.

Diagnosis ADHD is diagnosed by examining a child and their family.

It can be diagnosed by an experienced medical professional such as a paediatrician or child psychiatrist. Additional tests such as a chromosome test are sometimes
