The British government is selling off what it calls a "fraudulent and bizarre" 6,000-year-old artifact, apparently to help keep the country's finances afloat. The object, which is believed to have been carved from a single piece of wood, was found by farmers in the valley of the River Liffey in Dublin, Ireland, last year. "The stone is a piece of wood covered in bronze with a paint layer and stamped with a lot of indecipherable symbols," said Ireland's Department of Culture, Heritage, and the Gaeltacht. "It would be fair to say that the item is of no practical or aesthetic value and it's unlikely to yield anything in the way of further insights into our past," a spokesperson said. British Crown Jewels The sale is being handled by the British government's Department of Culture, Media and Sport, which said it has authorized the sale to help balance Britain's books. The department does not intend to raise any money from the sale, Culture Minister Maria Miller said in a statement. The object is believed to be between 3 and 6 feet long and weighs 3.5 tons. It was first reported last year in the Irish Times. Pictures of the object, dating from around 3300 B.C., have gone viral on the internet. The object was a personal "heirloom" of a professor at Trinity College Dublin who received it as a gift from his wife's mother, the university said. The woman is now deceased and her family have no interest in the artifact, it added. "There is a gap between our desire to keep this important object within the Dublin area and the reality of it being outside of our control," it said. The department said it has no plans to exhibit the object and its sale is "purely for financial reasons." 'Unique'
