I have a 1D array elements = np.array([1,2,3], [4,5,6], [7,8,9]) which contains positive and negative numbers. I would like to get a specific element in the array. I would like to select the element with a value greater than 1. To get this element, I use elements[elements > 1] However, the last element in the array is not returned. How can I interpret the values in this array as numbers greater than 1? A: You need to compare with float, as np.array returns np.array([1,2,3], [4,5,6], [7,8,9]) which is [1 2 3; 4 5 6; 7 8 9], which is a numpy array with mixed numbers. elements = np.array([1,2,3], [4,5,6], [7,8,9]) print elements[elements > 1] Organic growth in Chile: Deforestation, agriculture, and livelihoods. The past century's global transition to industrial agriculture has resulted in negative social, environmental, and economic impacts. This has been most notable in the global South, where industrial farming has expanded through a deforestation, degradation of soil, and promotion of mono-crop farming that rely on synthetic inputs. Whilst this has led to agricultural growth in South America, it has come at the expense of other non-agricultural activities. This paper investigates the influence of agricultural growth on the sustainability of rural livelihoods in rural Chile. Through an examination of available evidence, this paper shows that the growth of agriculture has significantly impacted the livelihoods of non-farm rural people. Although rural farmers have benefited through higher incomes, they have also lost opportunities to engage in other activities (e.g. cattle ranching). Furthermore, urbanization and urbanization of agricultural lands has led to the further decentralization of livelihoods away from the formal sector. Consequently, this has led to a continuing marginalization of 2d92ce491b
