The ability to predict criminal recidivism is essential in creating appropriate criminal justice policy. The Current Procedural Dataset, which is used in the administrative adjudication of parole and probation revocation hearings, contains several items that might aid in making criminal recidivism predictions. The two major international criteria sets used in the DSM-IV [American Psychiatric Association (2000)] and the COT [Bureau of Justice Assistance (1996)] do not appear to predict criminal recidivism as measured by the proportion of new criminal cases referred to the court; nor do the items in the BOPCAT [Bureau of Justice Assistance (1998)] appear to predict criminal recidivism. However, a new set of 10 DSM-IV criteria has recently been proposed as an improved predictive measure for future criminal recidivism. These criteria can be found in the recently published DSM-IV-TR [American Psychiatric Association (2000)]. The new set of 10 has superior predictive power than the six DSM-IV criteria or the 10 BOPCAT items. The combination of the 10 DSM-IV criteria and BOPCAT items, however, yields a predictive power that is as good as the best tools currently available. We have previously reported that normal rat kidney (NRK) cells in vitro bear some of the characteristics of Achn.NRK cells and that Achn.NRK cells in vitro have great resemblance to normal cells in acute renal rejection lesions in vivo. These characteristics are: 1) restoration of multiplication ability after they become irreversibly growth-inhibited, 2) inhibition of multiplication ability by complement, 3) subcultivation which are irradiated by X-ray (XR), and 4) cytotoxic action on host or congenitally Ehrlich carcin ba244e880a
