The 1950s were a time when fashion went from corsets, gloves and hats to the mini skirt, maxi dress and zips. I imagine most women of that time never considered that one day they could wear a bra as a dress or that a skirt might be held up with zips. The 1950s were also the time of the Googie movement which took off in 1950's California and came to Australia in the '60s. Googie is an architectural style which took off in California with the construction of the Googie-style buildings of the 1950s. These Googie styled buildings were mainly found on the outskirts of American cities. The style involved a rounded appearance with large interiors, stream-lined forms, a bright colour palette and materials which were low maintenance. Check out this amazing location shoot, created by Droga5, for next season's collection for Marks & Spencer. Shot in Milan, Italy at the Googie-style railway station, pictured here, the cheeky candid style of this shoot is something I think would be fun to try at home. I don't think I've ever photographed anything quite like this before. Related Posts When was the last time you tried to replicate your favourite clothing pieces using an outfit of your own choosing? If you love a particular brand, it can be fun to simply take inspiration from it. The next time you think about buying a particular piece, pause, consider it and just go for it. Here are a few...I was going to do a whole different list today, but I'm not sure if I should. So, the little rant I have going on is that I'm sick of
