Carboxypeptidase A (CPA) is a metabolic enzyme belonging to the digestive tract, including pancreas, liver, and esophagus. The purpose of the present study was to investigate the effects of several single and multiple toxins in the rabbit, a species with a short digestive tract, on serum CPA. Intravenous injections of single or combinations of the toxins: endotoxin, staphylococcal enterotoxin, acetaminophen (Amp), benzydamine (Ben), cystatin C (Cyst), penicillamine (Pen), resiniferatoxin (Rtx), thapsigargin (Thap), trientine (Trip), and zymosan (Zym) were performed. Toxin dosages ranged from 0.5 to 7.5 g/kg. The serum activities of CPA were evaluated up to 24 h after injection. The results showed that the single toxins have no acute effect on CPA. However, Amp and Rtx were found to raise the activity of CPA in a dose-dependent manner. In contrast, repeated administration of Amp, Amp and Ben, Amp and Thap, Amp and Trip, or Amp and Zym decreased the activity of CPA.Deloitte #AhhTheParty I had the pleasure of meeting some friends of mine at a small party at a local brewery. It was our first date night since my husband and I got married 4 months ago. We had such a relaxing night. We drank some vino, laughed at some totally inappropriate jokes (me), and ended the night with some really great conversation. I felt so good about the night. This might have something to do with the fact that I had three glasses of wine before I even arrived. But I digress. This morning, as I was getting ready for work I looked in the mirror. I got out the antique bronze brush and look at my new ballerina nose. I had something quite bad happen to my nose a few years ago and I hated it. I always thought that maybe it would grow back or maybe I could take off the nose. What I found out this morning was that I never really lost my nose. I found that I had taken off the tip of the nose
