This study explores whether, and what, primary care professionals do to deal with patients presenting with symptoms of anxiety and depression. A literature study was carried out to identify relevant issues in the literature. Two researchers then independently conducted a systematic review based on the EPOC Cochrane methods. Five relevant studies were identified. Two of them involved a controlled evaluation of an intervention. The others were individual studies based on clinical experience. In all cases an intervention was carried out to manage patients with anxiety and depression by the GP. A total of 177 primary care professionals were involved in the development of the intervention. The main methods identified were: psychosocial counselling, simplifying the treatment plan, reassurance, physiotherapy, relaxation and cognitive behavioural therapy. Psychosocial counselling is fundamental as an integral part of GPs consultations. In the case of anxiety and depression, it is a method that can be used in conjunction with the other interventions suggested for this type of patient. How often do we recommend to lower the fat content of our daily food intake? The answer may be different for different individuals and cultures. By taking into account our dietary pattern, we can certainly make some reasonable dietary choices to provide a safe balance for our health. Mutations of the polymorphisms of genes that are associated with the metabolism of a specific nutrient are the link between diet and health. Understanding the genetic and environmental roles is one of the most important steps to improve the risk for developing metabolic diseases. Dietary factors such as high consumption of saturated fat and cholesterol have long been
