Indium-111-RBC: a new agent for the imaging of myocardial infarction. Indium-111-labelled red blood cells were investigated as a potential gamma camera imaging agent for the noninvasive diagnosis of myocardial infarction. Ten pigs underwent 12 coronary artery occlusions. A whole body scan and a gamma camera scan were performed 1 hour after infusion of ^{111}In -RBC in six animals. Five animals underwent selective whole body scintigraphic imaging following coronary occlusion at selected time intervals (6, 18, 36, 60, and 90 min) and 2 h after infusion of ^{111}In -RBC (six animals). Analysis of the gamma camera images included visual inspection, a difference-image analysis and a stereological counting technique. Non-myocardial uptake was assessed based on a region of interest analysis of cross-sections of representative organs and the plasma. Myocardial infarct size was determined using creatine kinase assay. The difference-image analysis and the stereological counting technique were more sensitive than visual inspection in the detection of myocardial infarction. Plasma ^{111}In -RBC exhibited a linear decrease of image activity following infusion, but only for at least 90 min after administration of ^{111}In -RBC. Regional myocardial uptake of ^{111}In -RBC was detectable 2 h after coronary occlusion. Stereological and difference-image analyses of gamma camera images correlated well with creatine kinase levels in the myocardium. The elimination of radioactivity from the myocardium was well correlated to the myocardial extraction of ^{111}In -RBC. These findings suggest that ^{111}In -RBC is a promising agent for the detection of myocardial infarction with gamma camera imaging.
