The US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) estimate that approximately 10 million illnesses and 450,000 hospitalizations due to infectious diseases occur each year in the United States. New advances in diagnostics allow providers to identify specific etiologies of infectious diseases in the absence of a pathogen, but new technology-driven diagnoses may contribute to unnecessary treatments or referrals to specialty services, not realizing the value of a well-timed, targeted intervention. The concept of?appropriate use of diagnostic testing? is a fundamental but understudied topic in diagnostic epidemiology. In the related context of clinical decision support in general medicine, evidence has accumulated that feedback on the sensitivity and specificity of diagnostic tests influences medical decision making. But when it comes to infectious diseases, the likelihood that early diagnostic results will influence clinical decision making is unclear, and the methods of diagnosis have not been adequately evaluated. This study will fill this gap by identifying the effect of educational feedback on diagnostic tests on the cost-effectiveness of antibiotics in the treatment of acute cough. Knowledge of the types of interventions that are most likely to result in positive health outcomes can be applied in a larger context to benefit other aspects of medicine and public health, such as the influenza vaccine, infectious diarrhea, and pulmonary TB. In a randomized trial, we will provide post-test feedback about the performance of diagnostic tests to primary care providers (PCPs) in their offices of patients with acute cough. Our proposed trial will enroll PCPs in three US states and involve 2,390 participants with acute cough from all of the providers who will participate. The specific aims of this project are 1) to evaluate the impact of post-test educational feedback on primary care provider use of antibiotic treatment for acute cough, and 2) to evaluate the costs and consequences of post-test educational feedback on antibiotic treatment for acute cough. This study will be the first to report the impacts of post-test
