A Case Report]. Subclinical hypothyroidism and polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS) are two disorders that frequently coexist. Both conditions can be diagnosed in premenopausal women and that can alter the growth and maturation of the ovaries. The aim of this article is to present a case of a woman diagnosed with subclinical hypothyroidism and PCOS and to review the main characteristics and the pathophysiology of these two diseases. A case of a 29-year-old patient with symptoms of subclinical hypothyroidism, diagnosed by high levels of thyroid stimulating hormone, and polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS) is presented. The diagnosis was achieved by endocrinological examination and ultrasound examinations. The pathophysiology of this coexistence is still unknown.

The coexistence of PCOS and subclinical hypothyroidism can modify ovarian functions as well as the metabolism. Knowledge of the timing of menopause (menopause onset), a crucial and unique aspect of women's health, is the cornerstone of planning for and managing menopausal health. Age at menopause is the most important determinant of vasomotor symptoms, osteoporosis, and cardiovascular disease in the perimenopausal period and has been linked to reproductive cancer risk. In the US, the average age at natural menopause is 51 years. The determinants of the timing of menopause are not well understood, but are likely influenced by multiple factors, including genetics, environment, hormonal milieu, lifestyle, and health status. Genetic factors, such as specific germline mutations, are probably contributing to a small proportion of the total variance. However, the very existence of a normal menopause age distribution, with a significant proportion of women in the US and Europe experiencing
